INTRODUCTORY

THE astonishing commercial and industrial development of Toledo means constant growth of this community socially as well. The great building boom down town is followed by the construction of many new and beautiful homes, and more and more accessories to polite society.

This steady change in social circles makes the Toledo Blue Book more than ever a household necessity, and no effort or expense have been spared in bringing this, the tenth edition, thoroughly up-to-date.

The scope of the work had to be much more comprehensive than a mere home directory of Toledo would have been, because of the intimate relation between Toledo and the many communities which have been brought into close relation by the marvelous development of interurban electric railways.

We believe our patrons will agree with us that the ground has been more thoroughly covered than ever before, and we present this edition with real pride and satisfaction.

In this connection permit us to thank all who have contributed to the thoroughness with which this important work has been accomplished, and we recommend the advertisements in this issue as fully in harmony with the general high character of the publication.

The Goodrich Lawn Tennis Ball

The original American-made Tennis Ball is doing for American Lawn Tennis what the Haskell Golf Ball has done for Golf. It has added life and interest to the game and raised the standard of play. Officially approved by the U.S.N.L.T.A. and enthusiastically endorsed by expert players as equal to the best imported Tennis Balls.

The Goodrich is harder and stays harder in play; bounds higher and truer; cover lasts longer without ripping; is always uniform in quality. Every ball a tournament ball and backed by an unqualified guarantee.

The Haskell Golf Ball

*The best known and best liked golf ball

"Fools are ruled by humor; wise men by interest"

BABY'S loving, cunning ways. The rosy freshness and the innocent smiles will soon be gone.

Wouldn't an occasional portrait be a pleasant reminder of these baby days?

My new residence studio at 1607 Adams Street, has been fitted up for this especial purpose, and with my well known skill in handling these charming subjects the results are sure to be pleasing.

Reliable Jewelry Store

Come to us before buying. It may not be so convenient for you to cross over to our store, but we feel sure that you will be well repaid for doing so. We can show you as fine a line of goods as is to be found in the city or in any first-class Jewelry Store.

Being a little removed from the regular line of retail stores, we want to convince you that it will pay you to cross the street.

Come and let us show you through our stock, whether you buy or not.

Five Years of Continued Success.

The Reasons

The highest standard of excellence and the maintenance of ideals that stand for the best that there is, in musical instruction.

A faculty of thoroughly efficient and painstaking instructors whose conscientious efforts and success is evidenced by results.

Public appreciation of the advantages of a well directed Conservatory of Music over that of the private teacher.

A desire upon the part of the public at large for better things in the way of concerts and recitals which has been brought about by the active campaign which the Conservatory has made in this behalf since its organization.

ENTERTAIN AT

The COLLINGWOOD

O you know that you can entertain for your guests a great deal more cheaply and with far greater comfort at The Collingwood than it is possible to do in your own home?

Tell us what you wish to do and let us help you arrange your affair whether it be a large or small party. We are prepared to take care of any thing from a dinner party of six covers to a banquet for five hundred people.

During the coming season The Collingwood will be available for dancing assemblies, card parties, receptions and balls. The ball room will be opened to small parties for informal "dinner dances" at a nominal cost. We have several plans for informal parties and receptions at a cost that does not exceed that of giving similar affairs at your home. Give us an opportunity to talk with you before entertaining.

A FLOUR SERMONETTE

It seems rather strange, considering all the wonderful kinds and varieties of foods which constitute the human diet, that there should be one article—bread—so much more important than any of the others that it never even appears on printed bills of fare. But there is a reason for this, just as there is for everything else in the world, and it lies in the fact that bread is made from flour, and flour is made from wheat, and wheat contains all the elements necessary to sustain human life.

From this it appears that that flour is best which is milled in such a way as to preserve the largest per cent of the albuminoid matter contained in the wheat.

The makers and sellers of bleached flour and their apologists excuse the prevalence of this form of deception in flour on the ground that such goods are sold "in response to a demand for 'cheap stuff'."

As Mark Twain would say, "This is important if true, but it isn't true." The fact is, there's about as much demand on the part of the consumer for bleached flour as there is for embalmed beef, renovated butter, or any other food cheat—there's none.

Our activity in the cause of honest flour is not prompted by anxiety lest we shall lose trade by not installing bleaching machines, there will always be flour jobbers and grocers who want good goods, and to whom a low price is not an irresistible bait; we shall go on supplying them. There will also be plenty of dealers who demand cheap stuff either because they're cheap themselves, or because they don't know any better. We may not reform them, but we are glad to enlighten them. Our label will do both—to the benefit of their customers.

Taylor's Peerless is a strong, rich, glutenous flour containing the full stock of the wheat, and is as different from the bleached, chalky products that are flooding the market under the name of flour as white is from black. It is essentially a family flour, being blended so as to make it work equally well in bread and pastry, and if the suggestions printed on the back of the sack are followed, it will always develop that, delicious, old fashioned, nutty flavor.

Taylor's Peerless is not detained in half a dozen rat-run depots and warehouses before it reaches your flour bin. Its marketing is under our direct supervision and it goes directly from our mills at Mt. Vernon, Ohio, Loudonville, Ohio, and Toledo, Ohio, to the well ventilated flour racks of the best grocers all over Northwestern Ohio.

ETIQUETTE.

A General Word About Good Manners and Good Form.

[The following rules on Etiquette were copyrighted by Mrs. Burton Kingsland and Charles Harcourt.]

It is the stock reproach among Europeans towards us—this lack of aristocracy—which politely but thinly veils their conviction that we are a nation of rich and prosperous parvenus. We resent the reflection because it seems to imply the lack of qualities which, to our minds, the word stands for. Now, we believe the outward and visible signs of aristocracy are shown in perfect breeding, charm of manner, and unfailing courtesy, of which the inward grace is an instinctive refinement that is not merely a decorative attribute.

True aristocracy derives nothing from the possession of money—wealth but makes ill-breeding more conspicuous. Rank and station do not create it, since there are persons who consider that their social standing entitles them to a conduct that is often wounding to the feelings of others.

At the root of fine manners, however, usually lie the eternal principles of kindness and thoughtfulness; and, as some one has said, although courtesy is not Christianity, it is a very good imitation of it, since most of the rules of etiquette are based upon unselfishness, and the proper regard for the feelings of other people.

The social code has been written and reviewed as much or perhaps more than any other code of laws in the world. It is only the chimney-corner philosopher who scorns and sneers at learning the rules of etiquette.

ETIQUETTE NOTES.

There is nothing derogatory to us that we are not all conversant with the latest forms of conventionality. The whirligig of time brings about so many changes that what was orthodox in one age is heterodoxy in the next.

Well-bred persons recognize the propriety of making themselves agreeable to each other in a friend's drawing-room, whether previously acquainted or not. Introductions, however, make intercourse easier, and there is less awkwardness when one knows to whom one is speaking, the knowledge often suggesting subjects for conversation of mutual interest.

It may be laid down as a general principle that a lady in her own house may introduce all her guests without previously asking their permission. It need not involve further acquaintance unless one choose.

Casual introductions in the street, in a shop or theater, in an opera box, or any place where friends and strangers are unexpectedly confronted, relieves the stiffness of the situation; but such acquaintance is rarely claimed afterward, unless the pleasure on both sides has been very obvious. In public conveyances presentations are made only under exceptional circumstances. In making an introduction, the gentleman is always presented to the lady, the formula being, "Mrs. A., allow me to present Mr. Z."

A lady should rise when another is presented to her, unless she is much younger than herself. She keeps her seat and bows, when a man is presented. When a person is introduced to several others at the same time, just mention the name of the individual, and those of the others in turn, the person being introduced will stand and the others remain standing or sitting, as they happen to be at the time; accompanying the utterance of their name with a very slight inclination of the head towards the person being introduced. Men usually shake hands when introduced to one another; women merely bow and smile with cordial graciousness, unless they desire to show special friendship.

When a company is passing to the dining-room upon the announcement of dinner, a gentleman offers his arm to the lady whom his hostess directs him to take in. Upon formal occasions, the fashion is growing for the men to offer their arms to the ladies when they withdraw from the dining-room, and having seated them, bow and retire, to enjoy each other's society for a time.

In a ball-room the matter seems to be left to individual choice whether or not a man shall offer his arm, though it is no longer good form to enter the room arm in arm. The lady precedes her escort by a step or two, to be greeted by their hostess.

Wedding and dinner invitations are always issued in the names of host and hostess, but for balls, dances, afternoon receptions, teas and garden parties, the invitations are sent in the name of the hostess alone, for some unexplained reason, except when a widower entertains for his daughters. If a daughter presides over his household, her name should appear jointly with his. If a reception is given in the evening, the husband's name should appear on the invitation and he would receive with his wife.

A young girl should never invite men in her own name for any function, however informal, but she may write over her own signature that her mother or chaperon desires her to extend the invitation.

When an opera or theatre party is in contemplation, the same number of men and women are invited. The entertainment either begins with a dinner or ends with a supper.

It is a custom favored by some persons to announce to their acquaintances the news of the birth of a child. A tiny card bearing the name of the new arrival is tied by a narrow white ribbon to a larger card, upon which are engraved the names of the parents. A card should be sent at once upon its receipt, with the word "Congratulations" written upon it; but a note announcing the joyous event, should be answered by a note, written with hearty, kindly sympathy.

An invitation should never be accepted provisionally, a direct answer is required immediately; either accept or decline. If anything happens after declining the invitation that you could have accepted it, don't send word that "now you can come, if it is not too late." The hostess has probably already filled your place, and anyone who entertains knows how much trouble it gives to the hostess. She is too polite to tell you not to come; in the meantime she has to make a number of changes in everything; if it is cards, it necessitates her inviting others; if a dinner, the table has to be re-laid.

A widow retains her husband's Christian name or not, as she pleases, but if she is well known she is so identified with him that her maiden name would look strange. It sometimes occasions embarrassment, however, if a son bearing his father's name is married. By reason of seniority, a widow's card may read, "Mrs. Blank." This title, assuming a precedence, it is now the fashion to claim, and belongs to the wife of the senior member of a family—the head of a clan, as it were.

A divorced woman uses her maiden name, with the prefix "Mrs.," adding or not her married surname, which alone may be retained of her former title.

Some few women in New York have dropped their husband's Christian names from their cards, and put no address on them. Mrs. Astor set the fashion, but it sometimes assumes a prominence that challenges detraction. The "Mr. and Mrs." card is no longer used, except during the first year of marriage and to accompany gifts. The turned-down card is now obsolete.

A husband and wife send but one card each, when the invitation is extended by the hostess only; if issued in the names of host and hostess, it is customary to send one of the wife's and two of the husband's. If the daughter's name appear on the invitation, a separate card would be sent for her from each and all the invited guests; especially is this courtesy due to a debutante.

After a man has given an entertainment at his studio, on board his yacht or elsewhere, the ladies who have accepted his hospitality send their cards shortly after by messenger, bearing a few words of appreciative thanks, or drive to the door of studio or house, sending in their cards by the footman.

Upon the announcement of a death, friends leave cards at the door of the house of mourning. It is better taste not to write anything upon them.

Cards may be used to convey invitations for an informal entertainment of almost any nature, but never for acceptance or regrets. When leaving cards at the door of a friend who is ill, one writes upon them, "To enquire," and to a friend to whom new joy has come, a brief word of felicitation, if only "Congratulations," and the cards can not be left too soon.

Thirty years ago a young girl's entrance into fashionable society was invariably made at a ball given at her own home. Now we rarely give balls to celebrate this important event, but the formal presentation of the young woman takes place at an afternoon tea or reception, to which all her friends and those of her parents are bidden, as well as such acquaintances as they care to include. The color of a "coming out" gown is chosen with reference to its becomingness to the wearer. It should be invariably cut high at the throat and with long sleeves, and be light in texture as in color, and its dainty simplicity and "girlishness" make a contrast to the elegance and richness of the mother's attire.

The drawing-rooms on the afternoon of the reception are decorated with palms and flowers and potted plants. The window shades are drawn and the lights lighted, for darkness settles down soon after four o'clock during the month of November—the beginning of the season, when most of the presentations take place. Saturday is the favorite day of the week.

The young men are apt to be more free to attend, and are always thought to lend eclat to the occasion.

It is the custom in New York for friends to celebrate such occasions with gifts of flowers to the debutante, which usually take the form of bouquets tied with ribbons matching the blossoms.

These bouquets—sometimes there are dozens of them, and fifty or sixty is not an unusual number for a popular girl to receive—are arranged tastefully upon the mantels, pianos, and tables about the rooms, and the young woman usually selects one to hold during the reception of her guests, and so compliment the giver. Sometimes a pretty fan is sent instead of a bouquet.

The entertainment does not differ in other particulars from an ordinary reception, invitations to which include all one's acquaintances.

The young girl stands at her mother's side near the principal entrance to the drawing-room. The names of the guests are announced as they enter the room, and after welcoming them, the mother presents her daughter to each. Though apparently a trifling distinction, it is in better taste, and shows a knowledge of good form, if the daughter is introduced to her mother's friends rather than that they should be presented to her.

The only duty devolving upon the hostess and her daughter is to speak to the guests as they enter, and again as they leave, and to stand always at the door of the room, so that there shall be no difficulty in finding them. They need not stand as though rooted to the spot. If interested in something one has said or the desire to prolong the momentary conversation, lead the young woman a few steps from her place, after the first rush of arrivals is over; it but shows her to be natural and at her ease.

ical, she will impress many in her favor. She should pronounce the name of each person with distinctness and a gracious inflection of the voice, when presented, and not make too obvious a difference in greeting her personal friends from her new acquaintances, though a heartier handclasp may express her pleasure and cordiality.

Three or four friends are usually stationed about the rooms to assist in receiving and entertaining the guests; while two others represent the hostess in the dining-room. These of course arrive before the hour appointed in the invitations, wearing light, high-necked gowns that harmonize with each other, and without hats. If they have about the same set of acquaintances, they will know many of the guests present, but if they do not know them by name, they are representing the hostess and may speak to any one; particularly is it their duty to single out for attention any one who may seem unacquainted with those present.

The conversation generally opens with the invitation, "Will you not come into the dining-room, and let me get you some tea or something?" Let these young women remember that they are detailed for duty, and in their conversation with the young men present (for men are included in the invitations and their presence is appreciated), not forget their representative character.

In the dining-room the table is tastefully arranged with flowers, lights, and other pretty decorations of bonbons, cakes, etc., a single color predominating. Pink or white and green are the favorite colors for the decorations. Three or four men servants are in attendance. The menu differs in no way from that of an ordinary "tea," invitations to which include one's entire acquaintance. An orchestra is usually concealed behind a screen of plants and palms or a portiere of smilax.

The entertainment often concludes with a little dinner, given to the young women who have helped to receive the guests and to other particular friends of the young queen of the fete.

ETIQUETTE NOTES.

She is now fairly "out," as the current cant phrase has it, and invitations probably follow.

Some persons think it in better taste to give a more quiet notification to friends that a daughter has completed her studies and is ready to enter the world of society. Others are restricted from inviting all their friends by the size of their houses, and send cards for two, three or four afternoon teas, in order to accommodate their acquaintances. In such cases there may be a table in the dining-room prettily decorated, at one end of which a girl friend will serve tea, and opposite her another, who will pour chocolate. The debutante receives with her mother, of course, and never leaves the drawing-room until nearly every one is gone, when she may join her remaining friends in the dining-room to "talk it over."

It is usual for the debutante to give some special entertainment for the girls who have received with her at her "coming out tea" in recognition of that courtesy. They are the guests of honor, but others are invited with them for a luncheon, dinner, theater party, or dance.

A girl should keep herself informed of the current news of the day, know at least the names and authors of the new books, and be able to say something about those she had read. Above all, let a debutante try to speak well of everybody and cultivate the habit of seeing people in a favorable light. (This should not be confined to debutantes only.) The art of conversation well rewards the pains of acquiring it, and the ability to dance well is always a passport to favor.

Two persons are required to serve more than six guests well, and an assistant in the pantry will be found a great convenience, if not a necessity. In households where many servants are employed the luncheon would be served by the butler in afternoon livery, assisted by a footman in house livery, or by one or more maids in black gowns with white caps and aprons.

Either use a polished mahogany table with a centerpiece and doilies to match, or if you prefer a luncheon cloth, have the centerpiece but no place doilies. More latitude is allowed in the matter of napery at a luncheon than for a dinner. "A fair white cloth" is considered to be in the best taste for the latter, while at luncheon the table-cloth may be as elaborate as one may desire. The napkins are usually smaller than those used at dinner. At a young girl's luncheon wines are never served; the effervescent waters replace them, and at all women's luncheons these are increasing in popularity, and are regarded as in better taste than wines. Champagne is entirely banished.

The custom of giving favors at luncheons has been so overdone as to have been abandoned altogether. A bunch of violets, a single rose, or very occasionally a small bonbonniere is the only favor now considered to be good form. Violets are usually preferred. The name cards are simple ones, with the monogram of the hostess; but may be made to contribute to the artistic, complimentary, or amusing features of the occasion, if one pleases. On the reverse side sometimes a quotation appropriate or flattering is written.

Theoretically, artificial light at midday is not in the best taste, but no one likes to sit facing a sunny window with one's opposite neighbors turned into silhouettes, and then candle-light is becoming and the shades decorative. All of which reasons will probably conspire to exclude the daylight.

A formal luncheon differs from a dinner but in few particulars. Fruit is preferred to oysters as a first course, bouillon is served in cups, commonly with two handles, and the roast is often replaced by chops with peas or a puree of chestnuts, or by an extra entree.

The usual stereotyped luncheon in winter begins with grape-fruit cut in halves, the pulp loosened around the edge, the seeds removed, powdered sugar put in centre, and dashed with maraschino. A half is placed before each person, sometimes wreathed about with smilax on the plate, and eaten with a dessert or teaspoon. Clam broth or bouillon follows, served in cups; then lobster or fish in individual shells; an entree of chicken, sweetbread, or a "volauvent;" then filet of beef or chops with French peas or string beans. Chocolate may be here passed in cups with whipped cream on the top. The next course will be birds and lettuce with French dressing or a mayonnaise of celery. This is sometimes preceded by a "sorbet" or Roman punch served in very thin glasses, or a simple vegetable—asparagus or artichokes. The game may be replaced by an aspic of foie gras or tomato jelly in a ring mold, the centre filled with dressed celery. The meal concludes with ices, cakes, bonbons, and coffee, served at table or in the drawing-room.

In the summer a charming luncheon may consist of small clams on ice, jellied bouillon, cold salmon with green mayonnaise, sweetbreads, or mushrooms on toast, broiled chicken with lettuce, strawberries or peaches, with ice cream, bonbons, and coffee.

The guests remove their wraps in an upstairs room, retaining their hats; the hostess wears a pretty house-dress.

At our summer resorts ladies who have their own houses often give carte blanche invitations for luncheon to their men friends and encourage their women friends to drop in often. The result is usually a merry and informal meal, which rapidly ripens into intimacy. It permits irregularity of numbers and unequal distribution of the sexes. People sit where they please, and a late arrival is made welcome. They wear golf and tennis suits, and linger at the table, but take their leave shortly after leaving it, in deference to the possible afternoon engagements of the hostess, or all adjourn to the veranda, where coffee and cigars are enjoyed.

The meal is usually a simple one; two courses and a salad, concluding with fruit, amply suffices. Iced tea, or coffee, hock or claret cup, and effervescent waters are the usual drinks.

A breakfast given as an entertainment differs from a luncheon in several particulars which people are not always careful to observe. The hour appointed should not be later than twelve or half after twelve o'clock. Artificial light should, if possible, be avoided, and the table decorations suggest daintiness rather than richness or elegance. Whatever is saved in other ways may be appropriately expended upon the flowers.

One of the prettiest centrepieces that I saw at a breakfast was a round Leghorn hat filled with roses. A dish holding water was set in the crown. It looked as though a garden hat had served temporarily for a basket while the roses were being gathered. Strawberries formed the first course, served in tiny flower pot, lined and surrounded by their own leaves.

A breakfast should invariably begin with fruit, succeeded by a fish course, an entree—preferably of some concoction of eggs—one meat, a salad, and a "sweet," concluding with coffee. Sweetbread or mushrooms may replace the egg course. The meat selected is usually broiled chicken, with which the salad would be served, or salmi of duck, cutlets, or chicken a la Creole, when the salad would form a separate course, with toasted biscuits and some fine cheese. Game is not out of place at an elaborate breakfast; but as it is usually an informal repast, many courses are out of place. Ices are not served at a breakfast.

To show that entertaining need not be costly to be enjoyable, I may cite the example of one impecunious hostess, who invited a few friends to a breakfast, which her guests remember with pleasure.

At each place was an orange, cut transversely, the pulp loosened from the skin, as grape-fruit is prepared, and eaten with a spoon. A spray of laurel leaves with each (nearly resembling those of the orange) gave a suggestive touch. A course of egg croquettes followed, made of chopped hard-boiled eggs, moistened with the usual white sauce, seasoned with parsley and a suspicion of onion, and eaten with tomato sauce.

Chops with paper frills and border of potatoes fried to resemble straws, succeeded the eggs. After which a fair red apple, which had been hollowed out and filled with a mayonnaise of celery and apple, was placed at each cover on a plate, with a lettuce leaf between; the top cut off was replaced when the apple was filled. Cake soaked in sherry, with soft custard sauce, and coffee. A large bunch of young green leaves formed the centerpiece of the table, and a few peppermints, simple cakes, and salted nuts were all its decoration.

After a theatre party a little supper is invariably given, if it has not been preceded by a dinner. At a private house the table is set and served as for dinner or luncheon, though usually with greater simplicity. Watercress sandwiches, finger rolls lined with pate de foie gras, bonbons and cake, flowers and fruit are on the table. The usual menu is oysters on the half shell, bouillon in cups, followed by one entree—sweetbreads, chicken croquettes with peas, crab forcee or lobster a l'Americaine, the last a culinary triumph—after which birds, cold or hot, with salad, concluding with an ice or coffee. Many indulgent hostesses allow the men their cigarettes, while the ladies remain if they all acquiesce.

A chafing-dish supper is generally a pleasant informality, and one consisting of a Welsh rarebit and ale, or "golden buck" (a rarebit with poached eggs on it), with lager beer, is usually much relished. At these informal affairs the servants are not in evidence. Everybody waits upon everybody else.

In arranging a square table for a dinner for eight persons it is well to seat two at each end and two at each side, which makes the men and women alternate properly.

Under the table cloth, which should be of heavy damask, carefully laundered and ample enough for its four corners to almost reach the floor, a cover of felt or very heavy canton flannel should be laid. In the exact center of the table it is usual to have a centerpiece of lace, embroidered bolting cloth or linen, upon which the flowers stand.

Nothing gives so festal an air and withal such refinement and grace as flowers in the center of a table, or four slender vases holding a few choice blossoms flanking a jardiniere of delicate ferns. Smilax, disposed about the table, is effective in decoration.

Candelabra should flank the centrepiece of flowers opposite the host and hostess and smaller candlesticks on either side, or four single ones may stand at equal distances from the flowers and from each other, with or without shades. Candles are conceded to furnish the most becoming light, but they should be sufficiently numerous to make gas or electric light unnecessary. The uneven burning of the candles may be obviated by keeping them on ice two or three hours before using, and they should be lighted long enough before dinner to test their condition. As candle shades are apt to catch fire, a pair of sugar tongs within reach will be found convenient with which to grasp them and throw them into the grate. All annoyances of the kind are obviated by the use of a porcelain candle, containing a real one, which is pushed by a spiral spring as it burns.

All the table paraphernalia should be placed with mathematical regularity. Some scheme of color is usually chosen in the decoration of the table, to which the flowers, bonbons, candle shades, and centrepiece conform, but it is not now made quite as conspicuous as a few years ago. Small dishes of silver, rare porcelain, glass, silvergilt, called "compotiers," containing fancy cakes, bonbons, crystallized fruits, and salted nuts, are placed where they will be the most effective. Flowers and all decorations should be so disposed as not to obstruct the view across the table. Olives, radishes and other hors d'œuvres are served from the side table, and at large dinners decanters are rarely put upon the table unless their elegance is a reason for so doing.

All elaborate folding of napkins is out of fashion. They are simply laid on the plates or at one side, folded square, with the monogram corner uppermost, and a roll or square of bread two inches thick within the folds. Put at the head of each plate, an individual salt cellar; on top of this place an individual salt spoon. Nearest the plate at the right, the dessert knife, next the meat knife, still to the right the fish knife (blades turned in), then soup spoon, and on the outside, to the right, the oyster fork. On the left, nearest the plate, dessert fork, next salad, next meat, and on the outside the fish fork, the tines turned upward. One has only to use them in succession, beginning with the farthest one and "eat in," as the local Western vernacular has it. Butter is not, as a rule, served at dinner. On the right, at the head of the knives, place a tumbler freshly filled with iced water, but without ice, and near them a vase-shaped glass for sherry, a colored one, white and red or pale green, shaped like the water-goblet for white wine, a duplicate in white for claret, and a low flaring one for champagne. Small tumblers are used for mineral water.

The fashion of having a different set of plates for each course shows no abatement. A side table, supplied with extra knives, forks, spoons, etc., is a necessity. Upon this finger-bowls, until needed, half filled with water, each with its leaf or small blossoms.

The platters are passed, held on the flat of the servant's hand, (if not on a silver tray), with a napkin between, a large spoon and fork in each, from which all help themselves. The servants begin alternately at the right and left of the host, and proceed in opposite directions in regular order, that the same persons be not served first and last. At a dinner of twelve covers or more, two platters in duplicate, passed simultaneously by the servants, beginning at different sides and opposite ends of the table, beginning with the hostess. Nothing is more inelegant than for the servants to carry piles of plates in their hands and distribute them about the table, as though dealing cards. All plates should be brought and removed one by one. Upon withdrawing a soiled plate a fresh one is slipped quietly in its place, but not until all persons have finished. (There should always be a plate in front of each guest.) Neither must one plate ever be laid upon another for convenience in removal. This should be insisted upon. The plates should be cold for the salad and dessert course and thoroughly warmed for the hot dishes.

The servants must be watchful to note when fresh forks are needed, and at the time of substituting clean plates for those that have been used, they should be quietly laid in place, either by the same servant, or preferably by the assistant following him. It is excessively bad form to have knives or forks on a plate when placing it before the person.

Empty plates and those containing individual portions are placed and removed from the right, but everything is passed to a person at his left hand. A servant should never reach across anyone in placing and removing things.

The oysters are generally in place when the company assembles; each plate, containing half a dozen oysters, with a bit of lemon, stands upon a dinner plate. The lemon should be so cut that the juice may be expressed without soiling the fingers. The oysters should be kept on ice until the moment they are served. Many persons now discard the custom of having the oysters on a bed of pulverized ice, voting it "messy," and bring in the oysters after the company is seated. In this case, and at small dinners where soup is the first course, an empty dinner plate is at each cover. These under plates are left when the soup, and the oyster plates are removed. Red pepper and brown bread sandwiches are passed with oysters. The soup is served from the pantry, the plates about half full. To expedite the service, the servants may bring two plates of soup each from the pantry and place them on a side table, but only one must be carried to the table at a time by each. In removing the soup plates, the under plates are still left, which now come into requisition for the hors d'œuvres, which gives place in turn to those for the fish. With the fish a sauce is commonly passed, and sometimes cucumbers and boiled potatoes like marbles.

The roast or turkey is carved in the kitchen or pantry, and neatly disposed in one corner of a long platter, in another fried mushrooms, in another potatoes, in another carrots, both in the shape of marbles, and in the centre of the platter French peas, with a large spoon and fork in each, from which all help themselves.

The game follows with a salad, for which small cold plates are provided to insure its crispness. These plates are slipped unobtrusively into place as the salad is offered, and withdrawn if it is refused—not dealt about the table.

Salted almonds are passed between the courses and are convenient to bridge delays. After the game the table is cleared for the sweet course. Everything not required is removed on a serving tray covered with a doily (first removing the silver knives and forks), and the crumbs are brushed off.

Ices in individual forms are placed before the guests, but the larger forms are passed, followed by the cakes. The finger-bowls on a handsome plate—the choicest of the hostess's collection—with a doily between, containing a slice of lemon, a geranium leaf, or a few violets, are placed before the guests, and the fruit is passed, followed by the bonbons.

Coffee is served to the ladies in the drawing-room, and to the men, with cigars and cigarettes, when the ladies have withdrawn.

The host should sit at the farther end of the table, so that when the hostess enters the room she finds her place near the door. The butler or waitress stands behind her chair. When all have assembled, the gentlemen assist in seating the ladies, before they take their places. None wait for the other.

It is not customary to say "grace" at "company" dinners (aloud), unless there is a clergyman present, when he should be asked to offer the thanksgiving, which should be brief.

The women remove their gloves and lay them in their laps.

The napkin is unfolded to half its amplitude and laid across the lap.

At a glance from the hostess, who must not interrupt any specially absorbing conversation, the ladies rise, leaving their napkins unfolded on the table, or letting them fall to the floor. The men also rise and remain standing until the ladies pass out, the one nearest the doorway holding the portieres aside for them. Or, the gentlemen accompany them to the drawing-room, seat them, bow and return to the dining-room and enjoy coffee and cigars. The ladies chat over their coffee. They resume their gloves or not, as they please.

A dinner should not last more than an hour and a half, and an hour or less after the men have rejoined the ladies the guests should take their leave, unless music, dancing, or some special entertainment detain them.

The great majority of books dealing with social conventions are written by women for the benefit of women; only incidentally, if at all, is the subject presented from the viewpoint of the other sex. It is impossible to overrate the importance of Good Form to the youth who has life's battle ahead of him. Generally he leaves his Alma Mater to commence the competition for place in the world, with no advantage over his fellows save what may be derived from personal qualities, acquired or innate. His success may depend less upon his talents than upon his manners. "Knowledge may give weight," but accomplishments alone give lustre; and many more people see than weigh. Good breeding and an attractive ensemble effect the same end as a show window; they encourage relations which may lead to the discovery of more solid qualities. Nowadays the man is measured by his manners.

Manners, like charity should commence at home. There is no better field for practice, and none so proper, as the family circle. The young man who is not respectfully polite to his mother and sisters must not hope for the attainment of any considerable degree of Good Form.

It is within the power of any man of moderate means to dress well. Good taste counts for more than money in the matter. Some of the most simple facts with regard to fitness are not generally known. For instance, many are unaware that a very tall man may add a cubit to his stature with the aid of long skirts or pronounced perpendicular lines. A stout man enhances his appearance of rotundity by wearing horizontal stripes or large checks.

A man's wearing apparel may be conveniently classified as morning and evening dress, and these subdivided into formal and informal. Morning dress applies to clothing worn up to dinner time or gaslight; evening dress to that which is worn during the remainder of the day. The frock coat is of black vicuna or worsted. The waist coat may be single or double-breasted, and of the same material, of fancy cloth, or of some white goods. The black waistcoat is most appropriate for church, funerals and occasions which are characterized by a subdued atmosphere. The fancy cloth waistcoat, which should be quiet in effect, is best adapted for general winter wear, and the pique for spring and autumn, although the white waistcoat with the frock is considered quite smart for winter. The trousers are usually striped worsted, and should not be too pronounced in color or pattern. The boots should be of patent leather. Any other variety of footwear must never be seen in combination with the frock suit. A white shirt, with stand-up collar is the correct thing. The tie should be an Ascot, four-in-hand, or English square. It may be remarked en passant that the string or club tie does not go well with any double-breasted waistcoat, save in evening dress. Any headgear but the silk hat is impossible with a frock coat. Gloves and stick or umbrella are invariable accompaniments of it. The frock suit is the correct attire for weddings, afternoon calls, garden parties, early concerts, and afternoon receptions.

The business suit comprises a sack coat of tweed or cheviot, with waistcoat and trousers to match, or fancy waistcoat of linen or cloth, which should not be loud; the suit is sometimes made with cutaway coat in place of the sack; but the garment appears to be more appropriate to middle-aged than to young men, and it is more becoming to a slender than to a portly man. A derby, or soft felt hat, or straw, is worn, according to the season of the year. The shirt may be colored or white, with cuffs to match—the former being more consistent with the general character of the costume—with collar, stand-up or turn-down. The boots are black or tan; patent leathers are out of place with tweeds, but enamel is allowable.

Pique and white duck waistcoats are not in unison with the sack coat unless it be black. The coat and trousers always match in a business suit.

In the country, during the summer, a flannel outing suit, or one of tweed, light in weight and color, is the correct morning dress. Blue or black serge, with white duck trousers, is also in good form. In the country a man may wear knickerbockers until dinner time. The coat should match, or if not, it should be black or dark blue. Dittos—that is, coat, waistcoat and breeches to match—of a rough material, with heavy knit stockings of a similar shade, and tan boots, make the neatest combination.

The formal costume for wear after dark—evening dress—is variously called “swallow-tail,” “claw-hammer” and “spike-tail.” It consists of black coat, waistcoat and trousers of a style familiar to everyone. A double-breasted white waistcoat is often substituted for the black article, and although not absolutely necessary, it is very advisable to have on. The shoes are of patent leather, and the socks plain black silk. The shirt is of white linen, with standing collar and white string tie. White kid gloves and the opera hat complete the costume. The crush hat used to be necessary to complete evening dress, but the ordinary silk “topper” is taking its place.

ETIQUETTE NOTES.

The informal evening dress is contrived by substituting the black sack Tuxedo coat for a claw-hammer. The black dress waistcoat or one of black silk—never the white—is worn with it. The tie is black silk, the collar upright, and the gloves suede or tan. A soft black hat is the proper thing to wear with a dinner coat—under no circumstances a high hat. The summer straw hat is often worn with the Tuxedo, but it is no more in accordance with the fitness of things than would be a tilé. After sundown a light Alpine—they are made to weigh but a few ounces, and it is decidedly more appropriate. When in doubt which of the evening costumes to don, give the preference to the swallow-tail.

The black cutaway has no very distinct functions, and will not admit of definite classification. It is an exceedingly useful garment, however, and there are occasions when nothing will quite take its place. Although it is worn for riding, and on other morning occasions, the black cutaway is most appropriately used for informal evening wear, when the frock would be quite out of place, and in circumstances which preclude swallow-tail or dinner jacket. It is the correct dress for evening church, a local concert, or other similar entertainment, and for a dinner or evening call, when the host is not likely to be en grande tenue, or the ladies in evening dress.

A man can usually get along nicely with three overcoats, and of course he may find uses for half a dozen if he can afford them. If the number is to be restricted, a heavy winter coat with long skirts, a rain coat, and a light covert, or Chesterfield, for spring and autumn, should be the selection. Each of these may, on occasion, be worn with evening dress, but the covert coat, by reason of its shortness, is adaptable only to wear with the dinner coat.

White gloves are worn with the dress suit on formal occasions, and are also the correct thing at day weddings. With the Tuxedo coat, gray suede and tan are worn, and the same styles are used in caling, walking, etc. For business and sporting wear, dogskin is the most serviceable and appropriate.

The white shirt may be worn with any clothing, but it does not harmonize with the neglige character of tweeds, and is altogether out of place with an outing suit. A colored shirt cannot be combined with a frock coat—nor, for that matter, with a black cutaway—without violating good taste.

The turn-down collar is neglige, and should only be worn with garments of a similar character. It is the appropriate accompaniment of an outing or sack suit, and is not in bad form with the dinner coat; but it should never be seen with a dress coat, frock or black cutaway.

The standing collar is good form on all occasions and the man who may for the sake of convenience and comfort restrict himself to one style should adopt the latter. A daily change of necktie gives variety to one's appearance. The cravat is one of the most conspicuous articles of wear, being more frequently than any other directly in the line of sight.

The effects of certain colors in conjunction with one's dress, complexion, etc., should be considered. A fallow man should never wear light browns, but he can carry off reds that would be in dissonance with a fair complexion. Light blues and pinks have no place in a gentleman's wardrobe. The tie should be selected with a view to the effect in connection with the prevailing color of the dress. Scarcely any kind of light shade will harmonize with tweeds. A white or very light tie should only be worn with a black coat and waistcoat. A black tie goes well with a black coat when a white waistcoat is worn. Black or dark blue is effective in toning down a shirt or fancy waistcoat which has an inclination to be boisterous.

Do not wear a made-up tie of any description. Although the four-in-hand is sometimes worn with the frock coat, it is nothing like as chic in that connection as the Ascot. The four-in-hand goes very well with a black cutaway; but even in that case, if a white, double-breasted waistcoat forms part of the costume, the Ascot is in better style.

The white cravat for evening dress, and the black silk tie with the dinner jacket, are the correct things.

The string tie, bat wing or graduated, is adapted to use with sack coats.

Patent leathers are always worn with swallow-tails or the frock, but must never be combined with any but a black coat. Calf or kid of the enamel variety are appropriate accompaniments to the serge or tweed suit, and especially when a white shirt is worn. Tan shoes are the proper footwear with outing costume. They are appropriate in informal morning dress, when a colored shirt forms part of it.

The socks should match or harmonize with the clothing. The very pronounced or startling colors are in bad taste. Black hose is correct under all conditions, and no other should be worn with boots. Browns, the darker shades of blue, and neutral tints, go with low shoes and outing or business suits.

A high hat must not be worn with a tailless coat of any description. With swallow-tails, the tile or crush hat is imperative; the latter is en regle for extra formal affairs, such as the opera, balls, etc. Neither is permissible in combination with a dinner coat. The silk hat is the only headgear allowable with a frock coat, and the proper complement to a black cut-away suit, but it should never be worn with tweeds, even though they be cut with skirts.

The "topper" is the only variety of headgear which may be made to indicate mourning, and even that is somewhat old-fashioned nowadays. The band should not be worn on any other kind of hat.

The fact that your frock or dress coat is concealed by an overcoat does not decrease the obligation to wear a high hat with it.

It is a good rule to wear no jewelry—at any rate none in sight—but what is evidently serving some purpose other than mere ornament. The ring is no exception, for a signet is the thing of the kind a man should carry on the hand, and that still fulfills its old office in acting as a seal. A watch chain should be plain and light, without charm or pendant of any kind in sight. It is stretched from one pocket of the waistcoat to the other, and may have a locket, match safe or souvenir trinket attached to it, but the place for that article is the right-hand pocket. The fob—a relic of the days of our grandfathers—is enjoying a revival. It is somewhat old-fashioned and inappropriate for young men. If worn, it should be black silk, with simple pendant.

Studs should be small, of gold, without stones, or of mother of pearl, always worn in a white shirt, never in a neglige shirt. A scarf pin is in place in an Ascot; indeed, it is a necessity. A four-in-hand does not require a pin to hold it in place, and the better form is to wear it without one. Sleeve links containing precious stones are in bad taste.

A gentleman finds no other use for diamonds than to deck his wife and daughters with them. The man who wears diamonds studs and rings is in danger of being taken for a book-maker or a pawnbroker.

Raise your hat when with a lady who bows to another person, or when with a man who salutes a lady. Raise your hat in acknowledgement of any civility which is extended to a woman under your escort. Pay the same mannerly tribute to her sex when she enters an elevator, and remain uncovered during her stay therein.

A gentleman will not offer his arm to a woman in daytime unless there is actual need of her taking it. The arm should be offered to an old lady, one who is infirm or an invalid, in going through a throng or crossing a very crowded street. A gentleman should never take a woman's arm. At night a man should offer his arm to a woman. If there be two, he will extend the protection to the elder, the other walking beside her—never on the other side of him. In helping a woman into a carriage, protect her skirts with one hand from contact with the wheel; the other hand may aid her in stepping up, if necessary. A man should not escort a woman on horseback unless he is a fairly good rider. In assisting a woman to mount, take her bridle in your left hand, and bending the knee, lower the other hand until she can place her left foot in it. When she rises, with the aid of your shoulder, straighten up steadily, retaining the foot until she is in the saddle. See that she is comfortable and secure, bridle and whip in hand, foot in stirrup and skirt adjusted, before you mount. Ride at her right hand; never turn your back to a woman with whom you are riding; pass round behind her. If you meet a lady on horseback who desires to speak with you, always approach her on the off-side.

When making an afternoon call, the maid will probably offer a tray for your card; if not, leave it in the hall, but never carry it into the drawing-room, even though you be a stranger to the hostess. Divest yourself of your overcoat and leave it, with your hat, stick, and gloves, in the hall. In case of a first call, it is perhaps better to carry the hat and stick in with you. An overcoat is never worn in a drawing room. Remove the glove from your right hand before entering. Keep these things in your left hand whilst you are in the drawing-room. If it should be necessary to put them away, lay them on the floor beside your chair, and be sure that there is no likelihood of their being in the way of anyone. Advance at once to the hostess without stopping to greet any acquaintance. A man will rise when a woman enters or leaves, and stand to the side of his chair until she is seated or has left the room. He will not concern himself about seats for newcomers; the hostess will attend to that.

Keep your hands out of your pockets and do not cross your legs. Above all things, keep your mind and your hands off your clothing. Don't be afraid to bag your breeches or crease your coat. There are few more vulgar sights than that of the man who carefully parts the skirts of his coat before sitting down, and leave them dangling on each side of his chair; then, after taking two or three reefs in his trousers, pulls down his waistcoat and adjusts his cravat. The performance impresses the beholders with the idea that he is "dressed up" for the occasion.

Every act of hospitality of which you have been the beneficiary must be acknowledged by a call, and, indeed, an invitation entails a similar obligation, even though you do not accept it. Such calls should be made about a week after the event. A reception, which is in the nature of a call on a large scale, requires no sequel; but it is necessary to call after a dinner or luncheon, opera or theatre party, whether one has accepted the invitation or not.

If unable, by reason of illness or absence, to make a call which is due from you, write a brief note stating the circumstances and expressing your regret.

If you have taken part in a wedding as usher or guest, you should call upon the mother of the bride, or the lady at whose house the wedding or its attendant festivities took place, shortly after the event, and upon the bride as soon as she is at home.

The etiquette of visiting cards is very simple, compared with what it was not many years ago. We no longer turn down the corners of cards or fold them, and the custom of leaving a package of them on almost every occasion has gone out. Two cards will ordinarily serve the purpose—one for the host, and the other for the hostess and her daughter. If the family is entertaining a visitor, add another. The card should be left the day after a dinner, ball or other formal occasion, which entails a call.

Being unable to attend a reception to which one has been invited, it is good form to send a card for the host, and one for the hostess, timed, if possible, to arrive whilst the affair is in progress, adding one more if the reception is in honor of an individual.

ETIQUETTE NOTES.

If you call upon a friend who is staying with people who are strangers to you, leave cards for the latter.

As a rule, introductions are not made in public. Introductions en masse are to be avoided if possible. It will sometimes happen that you must introduce a person to several others at the same time. In that case just mention the name of the individual and those of the others in turn. When introduced to a lady at a ball or similar function, do not fail to show her some attention in the course of the evening. General presentations are not customary at a formal dinner, but the host or hostess will introduce you immediately upon your arrival to the lady you are to take in.

Men are expected to look after themselves and others at receptions, and to give as little trouble as possible. If the hostess has reason to think that you are a stranger to everyone in the room, she will probably make you the special charge of a man who is likely to prove congenial.

At an elaborate dinner a number of wines may be served; white wine with the oysters; sherry with the soup; champagne comes in with the fish, and remains on duty. The game is reinforced by Burgundy. In addition, whisky and potash or seltzer may be offered, and liquors will be served with the coffee.

Nothing short of long training will carry one through such a course of liquids with a clear head, and the young fellow who is not sure of himself had better wait for the champagne and restrict himself to it, or decline wine entirely, which he may do with perfect propriety, and without incurring the charge of singularity which the act would have entailed a few years ago.

However, the tendency is to serve fewer wines, and to have them of an excellent quality. At a small dinner, one wine—generally claret—frequently does duty throughout the meal.

Champagne is now taken from small tumblers, similar to those used for whisky and mineral water. The prevailing style of dining nowadays is a la Russe. There is no carving or serving at the table. The dishes are handed around by the servants and each guest helps himself.

As soon as you are served, commence to eat in a leisurely manner—the hostess will be served first. Soup is sipped without noise from the side of the spoon, which should be carried to the mouth not more than half full. Never tilt a soup plate.

There is only one occasion when bread may be put in the plate. That is in conjunction with a fork in eating fish when special knives are not provided. Bread is broken, not cut. As bread is eaten dry with hot meats, butter will not generally appear at the dinner table, unless it be in connection with cheese.

Croquettes, rissoles, timbales—all entrees, in fact—are eaten with a fork and in no other way. Cut off the tips of asparagus with a fork, and convey them to the mouth upon it.

The leaves of artichokes are picked off with the fingers, and the ends opposite the tops are eaten. Lettuce should not be cut up, but handled with the fork only.

Fruit is pared and cut up with the silver fruit knife, after which it may be put into the mouth with the fingers, or with a fork. When you have finished a dish, place your knife and fork together, and towards the side of the plate.

It is not an uncommon thing to see a man make a hod of his fork, and, using the knife for a trowel, slap one thing upon another until he gets a full load, which is not always safely carried to the mouth. Take small pieces at a time, and never have so much in your mouth that you can not speak with ease.

Dip your finger-tips only in the finger-bowl. You may lightly touch your mouth and moustache with them before drying them upon the napkin. Avoid all signs of nervousness
